To Whoever it may concern, Hasland has always been a seperate village and entity from both Hady and Spital and the three communities always were seperate and divided by the railway line and now the dual carriageway. I do not think either Hady or Hasland people would wish to be considered under the same council area. To think someone who has no knowledge of the area can make these decisions is most arrogant and ignorant of area history. I have lived in Hasland most of my 76 years and apart from Hady and Spital children having to use the same school for many years, no other option, there has been no close relationship between them. This seems to be an exercise for no reason except to give an official a reason to have a job!!! You are wasting time and money and giving the Hasland Councillors more area to cover for no reason. It would be better to combine Hady and Spital as they have more history in common.
