I don't really see what this gains other than a loss in votes to the Tory party as when I bought my house, I got it in Penn, we love the area and the community that it mean to us. Moving boundries is not correct as it would mean that we are newcomers to a new community which would be difficult for no real reason. The rational does not make sense as such a few amout of people moved would not have a statistical difference to even out the votes. I am also sure that a drop to the house prices in all areas effected would be negatively affected, which seems unfair and there should be compensation for this, which I am sure would not happen so keeping it as is would stop this. I think having a community that I have lived in for many years changed without a regard to the people that make a community, especially in a time where community has never been more important is wrong. To be removed from that feeling would not be good. I really hope that you think about the people that this affects rather than just seeing this as a line on a map another point to make is that you may not get a lot of push back to this as a total number but as a % to people effected will be quite high and also that a lot of the homeowner are older they will not be able to use or even be aware of this type of communication. I am aware that a lot of my neighbours are not happy with this.
