It is illogical and I totally disagree with the proposal to divide Oxshott into two by a line down a main road, and then abolish the name of our village by absorbing each half into other locations. What logic does this division have? If it's not broken, then don't fix it and Oxshott operates successfully as its own village. The adjacent villages of Claygate and Stoke d'Abernion are, respectively, natural parts of Esher and Cobham, but if they are cleaved off the side of their respective larger communities they could retain a unity with Oxshott, with which they have a useful connection through adjacent railway stations. I am a resident of Oxshott for nearly thirty years in the same house and have never felt part of any other community, and do not believe change is necessary.
