two things strike me...firstly, it would appear that although conservatives have a no overall majority since the recent elections, they chair every single committee. Secondly, turn out in warndon (where you want to expand boundaries) was 22%. Nowhere was it higher than 50%. This would indicate that people aren't engaging with local politics. I find it very unlikely that this is because the boundaries are wrong. it's more likely that they see no benefit to the system of local politics and are therefore disengaged from it. So it appears to me that this consultation is navel gazing to see if the conservatives can claw back some of what they lost by rearranging the furniture whilst a disinterested populace is looking elsewhere. Even if this is not a cynical land grab to take advantage of low turnout, you should consider what the real issue is - ie low voter engagement - and look at how you improve it rather than how you turn it to political advantage to stay in power.
