I cannot see the need for this, nor even the idea of this. In a world where public funds should be used to shore up our creaking NHS and other national infrastructure, this seems to be adding yet another financial and administrative burden. Why would we need additional representation? Surely we have enough. This seems like someone in Whitehall had an idea over lunch break and thought of something to do. There are plenty of things that need fixing in the UK and this, if it were an issue, should be at the bottom of the list. Focus on the big issues first!
