If the shifting of boundaries will in some way improve the lifestyles of the residents effected then yes. By improvement I mean easier access to schools of first choice, improving access to local GP surgeries, improved public transport routes etc etc. However if it is merely to improve the chances of one political party having a perceived advantage over another then NO. Leave things alone. People will vote how they want no matter where you tell them they live. I'd have thought as a council you would have more important decisions and matters to concern you than shifting boundaries. Get your priorities right and stop this pervasive point scoring attitude.
