The new proposed boundaries have more definition to how the locals in all areas actually define the areas where they reside so make a lot more sense. They are clearer to see so folks should now be able to clearly say which political area they are within, whereas before people crumbled that their area should fall into other boundaries that fit the development of areas historically over years of urbanisation. In agreement the new proposed political boundaries are more suited to how the city of Derby is built. It seems then that the head counts are more equal. Thanks
