This really is a strange-and a poor piece of analysis. Bredon Hill villages are a tight knit grouping of communities-represented for example by the Bredon Hill Conservators. It is recognised that Great Comberton for example is within the Cotswolds National Landscape-prospectively part of a National Park. It's representatives must therefore be both aware and expert in understanding these impacts on the community. The Combertons and their issues and opportunities relate to Elmley Castle..... Fladbury is a very different place with very different dynamics and elected representatives to sensibly be able to represent very different issues completely unrelated to the Bredon Hill SSSI, to tits setting within the Cotswolds National Landscape and its prospective designation as a National Park. I would respectfully suggest a big rethink to how these small parishes might be represented.
