I live in Patcham in an area that your proposals are now changing Hollingbury and Carden. Perhaps this makes sense on a map, as the crow flies, but when driving one would have to go out of hollingbury, into patcham and then back in to hollingbury to get from one part to another. There is also a field that naturally divides the areas and thus leads to different identities for each location. Drawing lines on a map doesn't take into account communities and areas. I just don't see it as a wise choice and whilst I'm aware people often don't like change and oppose it for the sake of it, I feel that natural borders should play a role in such decisions, enabling local people to beat represent the issues.
