I am concerned about the proposal to change the boundaries around Alnwick. Having two councillors working across the ward rather than splitting it in two takes little account of the rural nature of the area. The split could leave one councillor with close knit villages and another with far flung places on the outer boundaries of Alnwick. There are advantages to have two people with different political perspectives and different skill sets. There are also advantages in that one will often cover for the other when needed. This ensures a good relationship with Northumberland County Council and gives a strong communication system. The fact that such an arrangement is relatively unique is not a good enough reason to abandon it. In fact, it's success is something that might be considered a good model to replicate.
