Gerrymandering springs to mind. I can think of no other advantage of this exercise than the manipulation of voting boundaries. Where opposition candidates have been making head way, they seem to be having their wings clipped. This seems to be an exercise in rewarding failure and penalising those who actively contribute to the community. Perhaps instead of trying to sure up the seats of failing councillors, you should spend the time and money picking up litter, securing public transport, or repairing crumbling infrastructure such as our roads. Northampton is in the heart of a wealthy area, with remarkable transport links and it is all credit to this administration that it is the sort of place no one in their right mind would wish to be seen in (even if you really needed a cheap plastic case to cover your second hand iPhone, or get a tattoo). Ask any body living outside Northampton, whether they would sooner visit Leicester, Milton Keynes, Market Harborough, Rugby or Rushden Lakes. You washed your hands of a failing town council, by creating new district boundaries, and now renamed and rebranded West Northants District Council are trying to cement their position by marginalising those who legitimately try to achieve something constructive. I think I have made my point. Does this answer you question?
