The commission appears to favour numerous local Conservative recommendations to create new wards or otherwise alter and re-name existing ones. I understand that the original proposals which the council sent to the Boundary Commission were the result of a cross-party working group and that the proposals of the Conservative group were never shared with that working group. Since the local Conservatives and their principal spokes person, Cllr Liam Bones, have a history of deceptive advertising to the North Tyneside electorate, I wonder why the Boundary Commission are taking so many of their suggestions at face value? The proposed ward names and boundaries seem to divide certain recognised areas and communities, principally Marden, but there are others.
