Most people don't really know about parishes and wards - they know the 'locality' they live in, or what an area is called... so switching boundaries around may just be an expensive exercise they tax payer ends up covering the cost of - aren't York Council trying to save millions to stay out of debt, should you think about the cost of the work they'll have to do if you go changing 'lines on a map', most normal folks have not much idea what a change of boundary means for them day to day, or how it effects services they pay into and which councillors represent them - if this is t going to save any money, then just leave it alone! I live in Clifton, I walk my dog in many parts of the city boundary I shop and socialise across the whole of York, I'd like my neighbourhood to be maintained and serviced (more than it is for the taxes I pay!) and have opportunities for locals to be healthy and entertained and not be in poverty, but I guess all the other people in different areas want just the same! What will changing these boundaries actually achieve?
