I know councillors and officers work hard, and I appreciate the commitment involved. However, I don't always feel that decisions fully reflect what day-to-day life is like for people living here.

Before making any changes, do we need so many boundaries? Having several councillors with different priorities can sometimes lead to mixed messages.

My area has many strengths and active community life, but there is still missed potential. Funding and support often seem to go to the same well-established organisations, who know the system, while smaller local groups are overlooked. Issues such as transport and ageing well are frequently discussed, yet residents see little real improvement. Understanding these problems within the existing boundaries is essential before making changes. Better coordination, clearer decision-making, and fairer access to funding would help ensure any future changes genuinely benefit local communities in North Somerset.

And finally will there be a financial cost for the changes?
