Wherever the boundaries are now or in the future it will continue to need to be changed as the population increases. Perhaps we ought to be protecting our green spaces by making being a childless family more acceptable and even beneficial instead of incentivising it. We are already an overcrowded planet that is being destroyed by humans. Changing a ward boundary is the least of the council's problems. The wards need to ensure that they encompass the parishes as it gets a bit confusing during elections as we have seen this May when 1200 people ended up with a vote even though they were not entitled to one. Having boundaries that do not intersect cul-de-sacs or small roads would benefit residents for example when the pensioners' Christmas party is held for those in Hollinswood and Randlay Parish, neighbours in the same cul-de-sac are unable to attend due to one half of the road being in Stirchley Parish. I know that is a Parish boundary issue but you see my point. Borough councillors are not always effective in their role anyway so adding 2 more will not necessarily benefit the community especially when there are many who are also serving on several parish councils. If each ward is variable in population and size it should not make a difference as the council should work together to run Telford and Wrekin alongside the parish councils. Funding may be an issue but then it should be worked out by size and population.
