I support the reduction to three councillors in Bridgnorth, as it was hard to justify four. Albrighton and Shifnal have far more electors than Bridgnorth, but only three, and that should be corrected.

I always thought it odd that Claverley was linked with Alveley some distance away, rather than with the much closer Worfield, as it had been for many years before the last Review. Claverley combined with Worfield would together comprise the majority of the electors in a revised division, with some of the smaller parishes to the north making up the balance to around the county average.

Alveley always used to be in a Bridgnorth District Council ward towards Bridgnorth along the River Severn northwards, and ideally should be all on the east side, as there is no bridge across the river before you get to Bridgnorth itself. I would have thought that there would be enough electors to justify a separate division for Alveley, as there is no real association between it and Claverley.
