Changing boundaries is only seen by me as a manipulation of people by political parties to give themselves a better chance to get a majority. The 35 current councillors can't even get a bypass finished that has so far been in the making for 11 years. There are capital projects in the country of Scotland that have taken less than half of that time to complete. Politicians are just seen as figureheads for central government nowadays. No matter how you manipulate the boundaries, we'll still get a lot of incompetent local politicians doing what's best for their party, not what's best for the people of Worcester. Just as an example of this country's obsession with controlling people, the declaration at the end of this must be ticked to say you agree to being contacted by the relevant authority before they will even accept your viewpoint. So for clarification I'll tick that box, but I do definately not wish to be contacted by any body (that's you) that seems to think that it can manipulate my opinion by 'forcing' me to agree with them. In plain English do not contact me regarding your survey.
